1. INTRODUCTION

She strolls in charm is the song by Lord Byron that has caught the thoughts of readers since the Romantic time. It is also one of the prettiest song poems ever made and really shows the Romantic ideal of womanhood. Byron, a guy who lived an extreme life and had new ideas, shares his wonder and love for female beauty through lyrical words and many ideas. Byron starts the poem with the nice line, "She walks in beauty, like the night / Of clear skies and shiny stars." The comparison speaks of not only the looks of the woman but also of the enigma and calmness of the night. This study looks at how comparisons and giving human traits add to meaning and beauty in 'She Walks in Beauty'.

How Byron expresses main values and romance of Romanticism like emotion, nature beauty, individualism, imagination in a figurative language will be observed in this paper. Byron: The most feminine beauty he calls "dark and bright" all that's best of dark and light, in other words a perfect blend of manly and womanly traits that make her utterly beguiling.

We will analyse how two tropes (metaphor, personification) that occur together in a poem affect its gross overall effect and meaning, by illuminating a couple of examples. We will figure out how the themes in this sonnet — beauty, love, admiration— are aligned with larger currents of the Romantic period or more generally praise for nature/the powers of imagination/individuality. "And thus mellowed to that tender light," is a good personification to stay the beauty tender and soft, with emotive line.

AbstractThe paper examines Byron's 'She Walks in Beauty' as an extension of the purely visual observation of physical beauty to an encomiastic meditation on beauty in itself (as capable of evoking reactions, and a component of human reality). In this paper it is argued that the intimations of language and emotion serve to show how Byron's aesthetic homage is far deeper than a mere matter of aesthetics. The comments will deepen the appreciation of the poem in the context of Romantic literature its contemporary importance as a work.

2. METHOD

This article seeks to detail the efficiency of the qualitative descriptive method in the interpretive study on Lord Byron's poem 'She Walks in Beauty' considering the poet's usage of metaphors and personification. The task of understanding the figurative language in the Romantic poem is taken up in the context of Romanticism theory. 'She Walks in Beauty' was chosen as the data source in this analysis as it represents the Romantic period with its specific characteristics of the use of metaphors and personification and aesthetics.

For the examination undertaken within this study, data collection comprised of a number of systematic stages. The first, several readings of the poem were repeated, enabling the reader to understand the major concepts of the poem, its dramatic and compositional structure. This first reading made it possible to fully engage oneself in the material and to perceive the poem's musicality. Afterward, the process of reading became focused on specific elements of the text, especially on the presence of metaphors and personification in the body of the poem. All the quoted figurative language was recorded and classified.

The steps that are carried out in the analysis of the text involves that of determining the metaphors and personification, doing a semantic analysis to interpret the meaning as well as the contextual meaning of the figures of speech, and doing structural analysis in order to figure out the arrangement of metaphors and the personifications used within the poem along with the roles they play in the organization and movement of the poem.

The analysis of the data employs methods of semantic and structural analysis for the interpretation and elaboration of the metaphors and personification sculptures present in the poem. For the semantic analysis, it was required that particular phrases as well as the relations of those phrases to the themes of beauty and admiration were examined for interpretation. Structural analysis assessed the poem in terms of its structure with particular focus on the positioning of metaphors and personification in relation to the audience and comprehension of the poem.

Furthermore, this poem structures itself around a romantic theory which helps in the presentation of the figures in the speeches and how it addresses other aspects of the romanticism in literature. This analysis entails development of an understanding on the key elements of romanticism such as effective expression, love of nature, interest in the celebration of the self and the use of the imagination and how these elements are utilized with metaphors and personification in the poem.

In order to improve the credibility of the results, this study employs triangulation techniques, such as checking the data obtained from text analysis with data obtained from other literature, such as books on Romanticism and criticism of the poem ‘She Walks in Beauty. This kind of clustering ensures that the interpretations of the data are sound and based on recognized models of literary criticism of the works in question. 3. RESULTS AND DISCUSSION

Result of analysis Text analysis of the lyric "She Walks in Beauty" reveals the use of significant conceits and instantiation in structure meaning and aesthetic goods. The following are the results of the analysis attained Conceit

Metaphor

The lyric "She Walks in Beauty" uses conceit adroitly to produce a rich and meaningful image. The most prominent use of conceit is the direct comparison of a woman's beauty to the beauty of the night ("She walks in beauty, like the night"). The night, with its calm, mysterious, and graceful atmosphere, is an applicable symbol to describe a woman's charm. Likewise, the perfect beauty of nature is described through the expression "Of sunshiny contextures and starry skies," which shows nature as a source of alleviation and reference for a woman's beauty. The expression "And all that is stylish of dark and bright" enriches the meaning by describing a woman's beauty as a perfect mix of opposing rudiments, indicating a spiritual and emotional depth that goes beyond physical beauty. Eventually, the conceit "therefore mellowed to that tender light" describes a woman's beauty as a soft and warm light, emphasizing her gentleness and grace. These four conceits round each other and produce a comprehensive and layered picture of a woman's beauty in the lyric.

Instantiation

instantiation is set up in the line "Meet in her aspect and her eyes," which seems to give the woman's "aspect" and "eyes" the capability to meet and combine dark and light rudiments. This shows that womanish beauty has a strong appeal and is suitable to combine different aspects
